

Cardiovascular Imaging and Cardiac Imaging: Cardiac Journal

Home Journal Details

Case Reports and Case Series in Cardiology Journal accepts submissions in the following formats like case reports with images, images from original research, review articles, images from clinical studies, images from clinical videos, etc. Every paper that is published in the journal is available online without the need for a subscription, and it will have broad global exposure. For ease of use by the publishers and authors, the articles will be processed via the Editorial Tracking System. It supports the preservation of the standard of the peer review procedure and gives authors convenient access to monitor the automated manuscript evaluation and publication process. All the submitted manuscripts undergo peer review done by the external subject matter experts under the aegis of the Editor-in-Chief or assigned Editorial committee member of the Cardiac Imaging and Cardiovascular Imaging Journal. Approval of at least two independent reviewers and the editor is mandatory for any manuscript to be considered for publication.

Echocardiography is uses normal two-dimensional, three-dimensional, and Doppler ultrasonography to create images of the heart. Those who specialize in echo may spend a large amount of their clinical time reading echos and performing transesophageal echo (TEE), in particular employing TEE during procedures such as implantation of a left atrial appendage occlusion device. For certain diseases like hemochromatosis and amyloidosis, cardiac magnetic resonance imaging uses specific protocols to image the structure and function of the heart. With a focus on the coronary arteries, Cardiac Computed Tomography uses specific protocols to image the structure and function of the heart.
